health care policy has to be recognized as a historic example of a government-centric system. Under the General Medical Association plan, the operating costs of the medical profession are borne by the general public and will continue to be borne by the general public. Given that two-thirds of physicians are reimbursed by Medicare, and that about one-third of the physicians have not entered into a "lucrative" contract with the managed care companies, any control they do exercise has to be extra-territorial. In short, physicians will control the flow of money through the marketplace. The government cannot legally control physician decisions. Physicians who are paid by the government cannot bill the government for services rendered. Physicians will not be constrained by the government in prescribing medications and therapies. Physicians have a long history of holding back potentially harmful medical treatments out of fear that the government would reduce reimbursement. Physicians would receive a cost-free revenue stream. For example, in their pension plans, physicians are paid a percentage of a certain dollar amount that goes into their pension plans. That percentage cannot exceed the percentage that was in the plan for last year. This is due to the "non-earning spouse penalty." This means that if the husband's earnings go down, then his wife's income (as non-earning spouse) goes down. The
