The developing brain is composed of highly-organized multipotent neural progenitor cells which differentiate to form a variety of cell types. In order to progress from the initial proliferative to differentiated state, neurons must shift from an undifferentiated, symmetrically dividing state to a state in which asymmetric cell divisions generate a daughter neuron and a neural progenitor cell. In addition to regulated divisions, the process of neurodevelopment is controlled at many levels of gene expression, and much effort is currently underway to define the mechanisms by which transcription factors, chromatin-modifying enzymes, and other components of the molecular machinery associated with gene expression are put into place during neurogenesis. In this review, we consider how expression patterns of specific transcription factors can be used to identify specific stages of neuronal development and how chromatin remodeling activities are orchestrated during neurogenesis. I had planned on ordering a couple of minnows this week but that has been delayed. Tazinator's put up some nice pics of one of my first bronze reef fish tank with his Nitrex (naturally I had a little tanning on my mind). This tank is running 75 and has danios, cut and ladies damsel, whites, and a few other things.
