The current output of the charger is fixed and has a defined value, and its voltage should be the same as the input voltage. Yet, when the battery is fully charged the voltage drop of the charger is smaller compared to the voltage drop of the battery. However, my book says that the voltage drop of the battery is due to the chemical processes occurring inside it and if it is doing what should it not be dropping the voltage as the current output is constant? Also my book says that the current output of the battery charger is constant when charging. I think that this is not true, and the reason for the increase in the current output is due to the chemical reactions inside the battery. Please correct me if I am wrong. A: The voltage output of the charger is fixed and has a defined value, and its voltage should be the same as the input voltage. Think of it this way; The battery is fixed in size (ignoring capacity). The charger has a fixed output current. The battery has a fixed voltage. But a battery is a physical thing that has a variable output current and a variable voltage. The current output of the charger is constant at that defined current. The voltage is a variable given by the chemical processes taking place in the battery. I think that this is not true, and the reason for the increase in the current output is due to the chemical processes inside the battery. There is nothing "chemical" about this phenomenon; it's all about the way resistors work. Immunoblotting of mammalian major histocompatibility complex class I molecules: alteration of the alpha3 domain of the class I beta2-microglobulin-associated peptide by a new class Ib mutation. The class I molecules expressed by the mutant mouse strain T200 (a class Ib mutant) are reduced in intracellular stability and show altered electrophoretic behavior on immunoblots when compared to a control strain. We now demonstrate that the resulting altered mobility of the
